CREMATION .- The first serious effort in this country to systematize and popularize cremation seems to have been made by Dr. T. Julius Le Moyne, of Washington, Pa., who has erected near that town a furnace for the gratuitous icineration of human remains. A correspondent who recently visited it states that "the furnace is inclosed in a building which is at once the grave and the cemetery. It is of brick, but one story in height, with a roof of corrugated iron. It has three chimneys of ordinary size, one leading from the furnace room, one from the reception room, and a third from one of the corners of the building. The use of the third is simply to preserve the architectural symmetry of the structure. The house is di vided into two rooms, the reception and the furnace room. The reception room is about twenty feet square. Its furniture is of the simplest kind, consisting only of a catafalque for the bodies to rest upon, a shelved case, with a transparent glass door, in which the cremated remains will be deposited, a few chairs for the accommodation of the friends of the departed, and a small stove to make things comfortable in cold weather. A door leads from this room into the cremation department proper, which is a room of about 10 by 20 The object in view is said to be the avoidance of the evil results which have been occasioned by wells and springs being injured by drainage from graveyards, and it is said that the attention of Dr. Le Moyne was forcibly drawn to such subjects by the fact that he was one of the victims of the National hotel disease at Washington in 1857.-Philadelphia
